Because of high-temperature loadings, the SDW is exposed to a high temperature, such as 80 to 90 degrees Celsius. To prevent a crack from being formed in a mortar-based SDW or preventing deformation of the SDW itself, an internal wall (internal surface material) is subjected to surface treatment in a manner in which an emulsion is sprayed on the internal wall. However, when only the emulsion is sprayed on the internal wall, a luster of the internal wall having been coated with the emulsion is still low. For that reason, there has been known a technology by which a coating containing fine particles of titanium dioxide is applied on the internal wall on which an emulsion has been sprayed, thereby providing a fine luster to the surface of the internal wall. With the technology, the coating is applied on the surface of the internal wall by using an automatic application machine. There has been known a method for determining whether or not the application of the coating on the internal wall is sufficiently performed by checking whether or not a portion on which the coating is applied exists. However, the method has such a problem that the portion on which the coating is not applied is also detected as having been applied with the coating, and hence, the method has not been widely used. When the coating is not fully applied on the internal wall, an adhesion failure is liable to occur. For that reason, there has been suggested a technology by which a condition of application of the coating is checked by applying a coating having an identification mark on an application surface of the coating (JP 2002-241379A). When the coating is applied on the external wall, the surface of the external wall may have a luster of low quality due to the coating having been applied in an
